Darn those dogs anyway, try as you will you can't teach them any culture, no matter how hard you try.

Meat is meat to them, and it matters not if the poor honest and round shouldered butcher is the sole support of nine lovely children, as we said before "Meat is Meat"

Among all Crooks there is always a genuis Crook , who cooks up shrewd schemes to achieve their ruthless wants.

This butcher had stopped at a customers house and was energetically chopping his meat, when who should step up but Gerald Chapman Dog. He annoys the butcher and then runs away, then he'd signal to his unscrupulous cronies and trys again. This time he makes the old man mad and he chases the dog away.

Meanwhile the others climb into the wagon and make off with the contents, when the butcher comes back they are just leaving and he is furious, it is then that he notices a late comer, little Charles Cat trying to struggle away with half a cow, but when the little scoundrel sees the Butcher he puts it all right back. This sort of conduct makes a big hit with the old butcher and he offers his hand to the honest little thief but instead of accepting it, the little dumbell only spits into the butchers hand and then turns and runs grabbing a string of sausages as he goes.

The little scoundrel leads the old butcher a merry chase and hides himself away at the edge of a cliff and kicks the butcher over, also when the dog catcher comes along he does his stuff again.

He hurries back and releases all of his friends that have been captured by the dog catcher, at three-thirty that same afternoon the whole blooming croud have a big feast of "Hot Dogs" and Sirloin steak, and every one ate happily all day long.

AESOP says:-

"It ain't all profit in the butcher business."
